01 / STILLWATER

Propose a conversation, not a finished room.

STILLWATER explores an imagined shared reading corner as a proposal for discussion. Its scenes establish visual tone, not a real site or approved design.

The proposal asks whether a small reading-focused setting is worth investigating. It does not claim that a venue, budget, operator or responsible reviewer has been appointed.

02 / STILLWATER

Use the proposal in three passes.

First read the intention, then the unresolved conditions, then the proposed handoff. A persuasive image should not hide a missing source.

Pages 3–5 explain the idea and alternatives. Pages 6–8 distinguish responsibilities, resources and review questions. Pages 9–10 identify the response sought and the limits of the proposal.

03 / STILLWATER

Define the problem without inventing demand.

The imagined issue is a desire for a quieter place to read together. That desire is a premise for the exercise, not a measured community need.

A real problem statement would identify its source and scope. Until such evidence exists, use language such as intention to explore rather than unmet demand has been proven.

Describe the proposed experience.

Imagine arriving, finding a place to pause and choosing whether to read alone or join a conversation. This narrative is not a tested user journey.

The sequence helps a reader discuss atmosphere and purpose. It does not supply an approved route, furniture arrangement, capacity or rule for operating a real space.

Keep an alternative beside the favourite.

Compare a dedicated reading corner with a temporary reading session in an existing room. Both are fictional options rather than confirmed plans.

An alternative is useful when it tests the same intention under different conditions. Do not turn a preferred image into evidence that the preferred option is feasible.

Separate responsibilities from appointments.

The concept writer can state the idea, a source reviewer can check evidence and an authorised decision-maker can address a real commitment. These are role categories only.

No person has accepted a task through this template. Confirm actual responsibility outside the document before presenting a named owner or a reviewed decision.

Name the missing resource categories.

This example supplies no prices. Venue arrangements, staffing, furniture, maintenance and appropriate reviews remain separate questions.

A short list of attractive objects is not a budget. Record unknown categories explicitly rather than inserting invented totals to make the document look finished.

Record the conditions for a next step.

A next conversation could clarify source quality, responsibility and the range of options. It is not permission to purchase, install or operate anything.

Use a condition such as obtain relevant site information rather than a promise such as open next month. A condition makes the dependency visible without inventing a schedule.

Ask for a bounded response.

Invite a reader to identify a missing source, challenge an assumption or suggest a relevant alternative. Do not ask the document to stand in for formal approval.

A useful response identifies the passage being discussed and the kind of evidence needed.

Agreeing with an image is not the same as accepting a real project responsibility.

Retain the proposal boundary.

Attach the fictional-source note, current version and unresolved conditions whenever the proposal is shared. The pictures remain illustrations even after the text is edited.

A real proposal requires its own verified context and appropriate decision process.
